Then if I need to reuse the variable outside of the function I can't access it. The only way to access it is if I re-declare it outside of the function. Is there a way to define a global variable and keep it private to the function? A: You have two choices: Pass it as an argument to the function: function foo() { var myPrivateVar = 'world'; } foo(myPrivateVar); A: As others have pointed out, the best way is to define a local variable inside a function and then define a global variable (if you need to share it between multiple functions): (function($) { var myLocalVar = 'hello'; $.myClass});
